About half a dozen years after the appearance of the Sea King, with powers more fully developed, Bigg published a dramatic poem, entitled Night and the Soul, which, though marred by extravagances in some parts, was nevertheless full of genius of a high order, and gave indications of much future promise. It made its appearance in the columns of The Critic; then in a collected form; and was very appropriately dedicated to the author's brother James. The germ of this fine poem--though in all probability the writer of it was unconscious of the fact--may be found in a remark of Lord Bacon's where he says, that Philosophy, when studied superficially, leads to unbelief and atheism; but when...
