The chief argument usually urged against the County Unit of Administration is the fear expressed that the members of the county board of education may not measure up to the educational den ends of the towns and cities. But surely the problems and needs of rural education indicate the necessity for as broad and constructive educational statesmanship as the towns and cities; and both deserve and call for the services of the very best and biggest men the county affords. Unless the men composing our boards of education are in advance of the prevailing educational sentiment of the community we cannot expect them to lead any movement for better urban or rural public schools; and unless they are strong and influential men we cannot expect them to command much following. A few and increasing number of counties have evidently come to this view, and it is a matter that should seriously engage the attention of the Grand Juries who appoint board members.
