Excerpt: .if he dared touch them---no matter how well and strong he might be--he would surely grow weaker and weaker every day until he would die. The fairies had a king and a queen--the queen having more power than all.of the others put together. They were very fond of hunting. All their horses had tinkling bells on their manes, and the saddles and bridles were silk and velvet. All of the metal about their harness was gold. VVhen the fairies were to start, they separated into three parties. One party rode brown horses and another grey ones; but the queen, the king, and the nobles rode snow-white horses. The prime minister was mounted on a dashing coalblack charger. Away they would fly like the wind, but so gentle did the horses step that they never bent a rose bush nor brushed the dew from the grass. A man, walking home in the darkness, never guessed that this lovely procession was near unless he heard the tinkling bells, or perhaps a faint bugle call. Before break of day the hunt had ended and all of the fairies were at home again. WITCHES. In the home of Burns, as in the homes of many other Scotch boys, there was a teller of stories--not alone about brownies and fairies, but also about witches and other curious creatures. Burns mind was deeply impressed with these tales, and his lively imagination and good humor led him to make various uses...
