Excerpt: . . . and simplest expedient for supporting a structure; it is supposed to have originated from the big stone placed over a doorway in the days before the idea of the true arch was developed. Other engineers, for instance, Mr. Carlos Van Law, are of the opinion that the flat arch was a development from the true arch, and that, in form and principle, it is the real origin of our modern invention of fire-proof floor construction with its so-called arch-tiles. gestion of brown walls; on the onlooking slopes there is a decrease in the density of building and an increase of verdure, until the top of the ridges is reached, where there are no dwellings, but only the dark red earth of the cornfields, defined by hedges of organ cactus. Surrounding the town and overlooking it, are golden brown hills, with contours deeply eroded and...
